Growing Class

ART: F. ROBERGE
STORY: N. CUTI

Kin was walking through the short grass with his girlfriend Kari when they heard the heavy footfalls of one of the giant ones. Since they were lil' folk, elves, hardly more than four inches tall, they decided that it would be wise if they retreated from the giant's path. A pine cone had fallen to the ground nearby, and the two elves quickly scampered behind the multi-ridged seed.

The forest was cool and streaked with sunlight. It was a beautiful day for a picnic which brought the giants to the woods because they were rarely seen on days of foul weather. These two giants were very close in age to the hidden elves, and they were also a boy and girl. The boy had a shiny instrument in his hand and was showing it to the girl who didn't seem to be interested in it. Eventually, she became bored and ran off. Hastily, he tried to stuff the device in his pocket; but he was in too much of a rush to chase after her, and the device fell to the ground as he leaped over a gurgling stream.

"Golly," said Kari as she stepped out from behind the pine cone. "I've never seen a giant before. I didn't realize that they were so tall. They must have been at least ... oh, at least two feet tall."

"Much bigger than that," said Kin in a tone of voice that sounded like bragging. "I've seen lots of giants and they're at least fifteen feet tall and the big grown-ups are even taller."

Kari was impressed by Kin's show of knowledge, so much so that she ventured close to the shiny object which the boy-giant had dropped in the grass. She was certain that Kin, the giant-expert, would know exactly what it was.

"What's this?" she asked, pointing to the smooth round disc in the grass. It was as large as she was tall.

"It looks like a pool of water because I can see the grass through it; but it isn't wet, and it's hard?"

To Kin, Kari's description sounded like a riddle; and riddles had always baffled him, but he didn't want to appear to be stupid. What is it that can be seen through, he thought to himself, is hard but not wet?

"I have it," said Kin triumphantly, "Ice."

"But it's not cold," said Kari. She was disappointed in Kin when she realized that he also had no idea what the disc was. However, Kin was undaunted and decided that the only way to uncover the secret of the disc was to examine the disc from a different angle.

"Let's lift the disc," he suggested, "and set it on its edge. If we could see through it, we could discover if it has magical properties or not."

Magic? She hadn't thought of it as being magical. She had heard that the giants possessed wondrous powers; and it was logical to suppose that this disc was one of their magical devices, but it hadn't occurred to her. Her faith was restored in Kin for being so clever, and she happily assisted him in setting the disc on its edge.

"My goodness!" exclaimed Kari when she viewed Kin through the glass disc, "You've become a giant! Please watch where you step, or you'll crush me!"

"But I am the same size that I have always been, Kari, it is you who has grown to gigantic dimensions."

"No, no!" insisted Kari. "I have not changed and I will show you."

Quickly, she joined Kin on the other side of the glass disc.

"As you can see, I am still an elf."

"And so am I, or am I?"

"What do you mean, Kin?" asked Kari. "I can see that you are an elf. You are only slightly taller than me, and I am still an elf."

"Are you?"

"Stop that!" shouted Kari angrily. She was certain that Kin was teasing her. "You're confusing me."

"Listen to me, Kari."

Kin's voice became serious, and he began to pace and point toward the sky.

"That disc is a growing glass! It makes whatever stands behind it grow tall. That is why the giants are so big, because they have growing glasses."

"And since we stood behind it we grew into giants, right, Kin?"

"Wrong!" came a deep voice from behind them.

Kin and Kari turned to see Kin's uncle Lok standing in the grass with his arms folded angrily across his chest. Although he was obviously in a furious temper, what alarmed the children even more was that Lok was covered from head to foot in soot.

"That," Lok said in a rage as he pointed to the growing glass, "is not a growing glass! It is a magnifying glass! It magnifies things so that they appear to be bigger than they really are but as you can see it doesn't make anything taller."

Then Lok's voice became calm.

"It also magnifies the rays of the sun, causing things to become hot and catch fire."

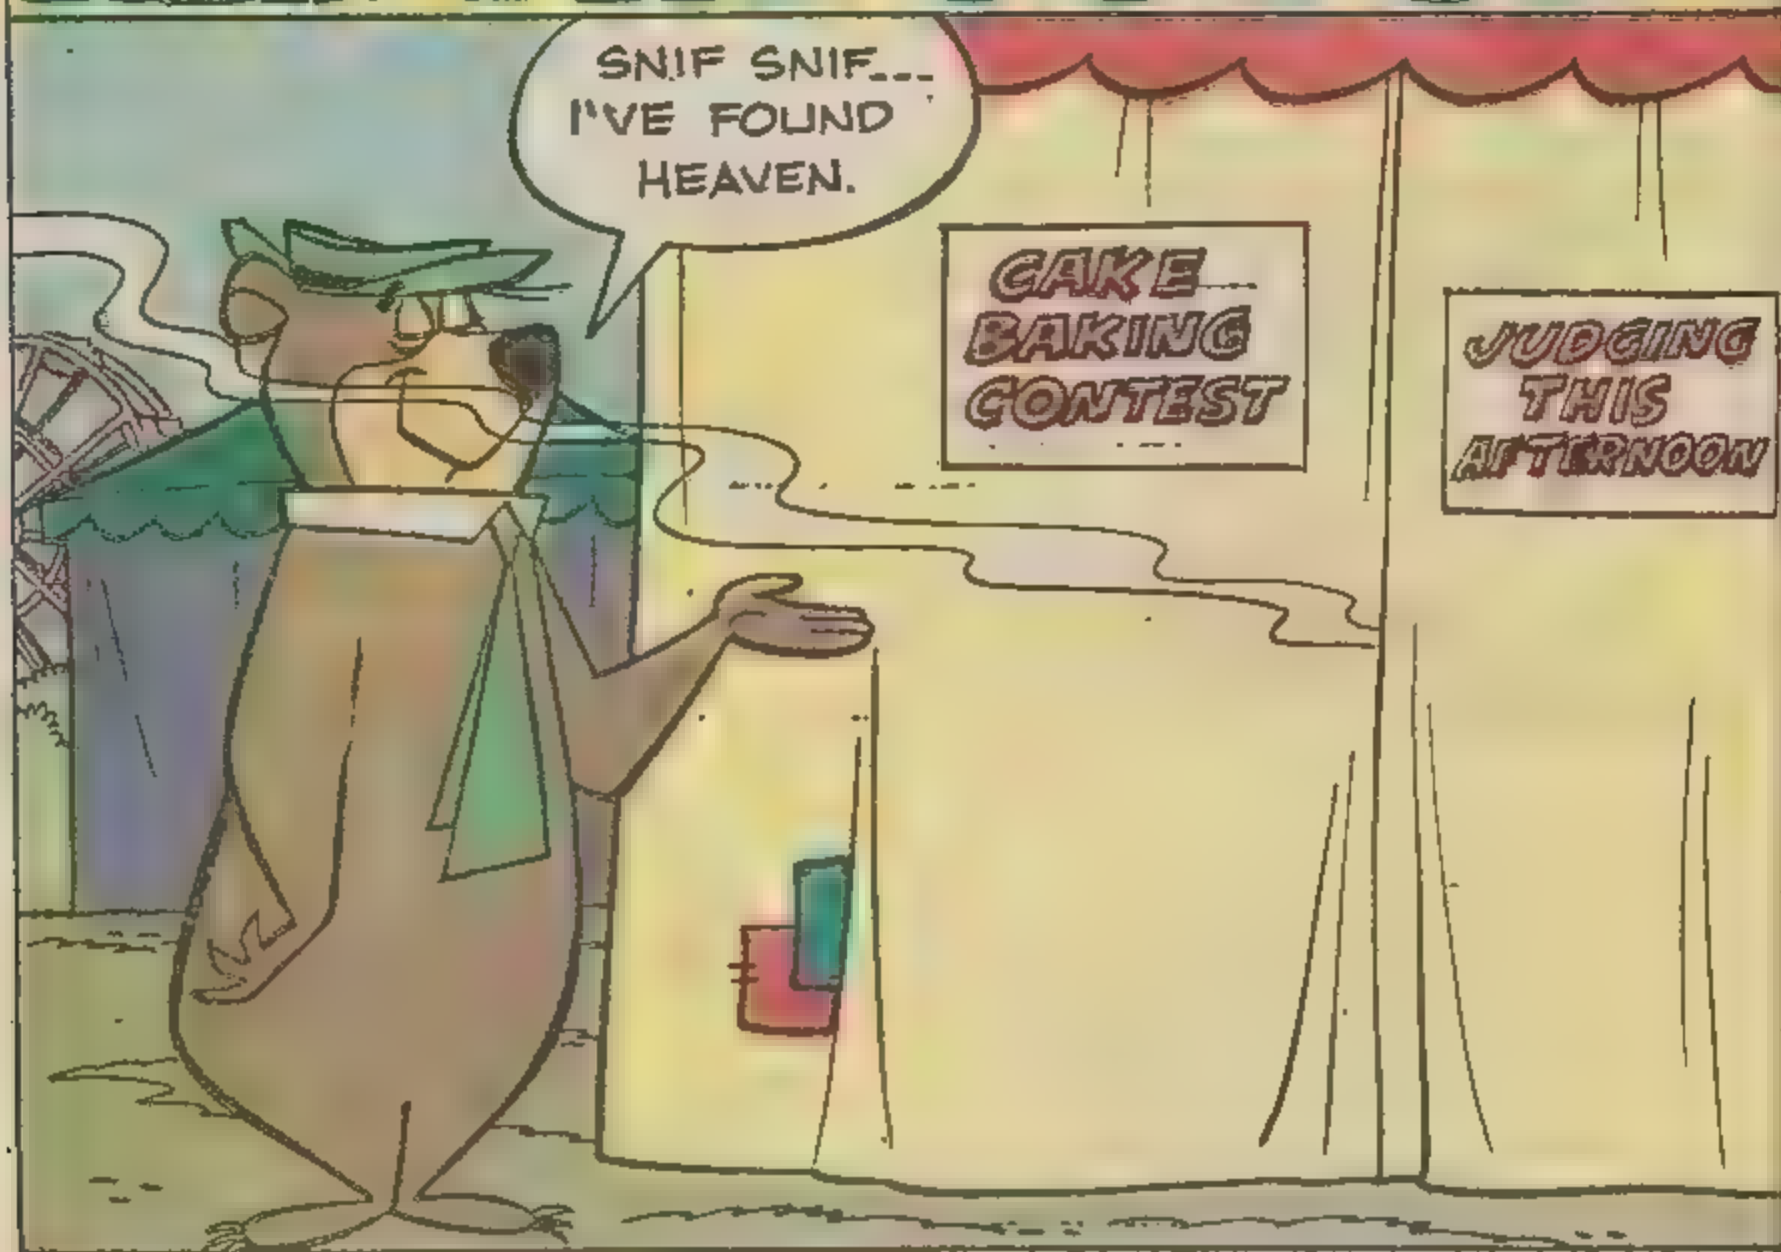

"It does?" questioned the children. "What caught fire?"

"Nothing much," said Lok "just THE ENTIRE VILLAGE OF BRAC!"

One of the first ceremonies held after the village of Brac had been rebuilt was a public spanking.
